A brief note on an educational philosophy which, for the sake of brevity, risks pomposity:

If I must summarize my educational philosophy, I might attempt to do it by stating what I think are four major purposes of education. I believe that education must prepare the student to live and participate in society, that education must provide the student with the means and the inspiration to advance the existing body of knowledge in the world, that education must serve to evaluate society and to provide the leadership for needed societal innovations, and that education must provide meaningful intellectual stimulation and the opportunity for cultural expression in the community.
